International In October 2010, Autodesk released the open-source AutoCAD Source Code under the GNU GPL v3. Its documentation and development tools are included in a single package: AutoCAD Source Code. It is distributed without restrictions of the source code in a compressed file format, thus requiring no installation. Developers need only to download and install the source code, as they would for any other software that they write. AutoCAD Source Code was used to write the tutorial released in November 2012 on Autodesk's web site. It includes several tutorials explaining how to use the new version of AutoCAD. In March 2015, the

I have tried a lot of solutions but I'm stuck at the end. I know that the average of three channels is gray. But I don't know how to do that. I have been looking for ways to do this using OpenCV. The image I'm trying to convert is this one: This is what I get in Matlab: I have tried to convert the image using the command: canny = cv2.Canny(img,50,200); But I only get this: Does someone know how to convert it to gray or grayscale using OpenCV? A: The grey image is equal to the result of the following operation: (img1-img2)/img1 + (img3-img4)/img3 I think this is what you want. Hope it helps! LAS VEGAS, Nev. (AP) — It wasn't pretty, and at least one player felt the drama of the regular season was tinged with just a bit too much intrigue. The Golden State Warriors closed the preseason with an exhibition game on Friday against the Los Angeles Clippers at Vivint Smart Home Arena. The game didn't go anything like most of the drama-filled Warriors' final three games of the preseason. "It wasn'
